Canada Labour Law says it is illegal for employers to engage in -

- Surveillance of workers who attend union meetings, or any undercover activity which would indicate that employees are being spied on;
- Threatening or punishing workers with termination, lay off, cut hours, cut duties, or discipline for union activity;
- Granting or promising wage increases, benefit improvements, promotions, improvements in working conditions, or special concessions to keep the union out;
- Threatening to or actually closing the facility or slashing operations to punish union activity;
- Questioning employees about union matters, union meetings, union interest, how they intend to vote or about other employees feelings towards a union;
- Threatening to move the facility or failing to grant a scheduled wage increase because of union activity;

All of these acts violate Federal Labour Laws - and your rights as Canadians. Stand up for your dignity and respect on the job. Report all violations - your employer must respect your rights.
